* Patrĭcius, ii. m. [à pater & cieo, Liv. Sed sæpè in originibus lusere veteres; simpliciter à pater, patricius, ut à faber, fabricius] (1) A patrician, one of the race of those who were created senatours in the time of Romulus, being only a hundred, to whom after the Sabine war another century was added; these were called patres, and patricii majorum gentium. Another century was added by Tarquinius Priscus, in order to settle his new government; but these, and those afterwards added by Brutus, were distinguished from the former by the title of patres minorum gentium; though Tacitus seemeth to say only these last were so called. Under the emperours, many of the old patrician families becoming extinct, they were made up out of the plebeians, whence neither were all patricians senatours, as under the kings, nor all senatours patricians. Later emperours raised to this dignity such as they made of their council.
